DARK SIDE OF THE CAVE: Beyond The Mena Connection Ethel Halstead

This book began as an angry letter to a relative after Ethel Halstead had tried to visit an ancestral cemetery where two of her great-great-grandfathers from the civil war era were buried. She was warned by her brother that visiting the old homestead would not be a wise thing to do. Her brother informed her that he and his wife had been shot at while trying to reach the long abandoned, Black Fork Mountain homestead. Ethel had heard of the infamous 'Mena Connection' but had paid it little attention until she realized it might still be an ongoing operation that was affecting her personally, now. She was anxious to learn why she had to avoid the old homestead where she had spent many happy hours as a child. Later, she read an article from a newspaper, The Mena Star, stating that her ancestors' graves had been vandalized and their civil war medals, and one headstone which contained medals, had been stolen. At that point, Ethel went on the Internet and began reading every article she could find about the 'Mena Connection'. When she read the story about two young boys that had met with disaster because they happened upon something they shouldn't have, she remembered her brother's warning, and decided to turn her angry letter into a 'fictional?' book.
